They were trying to get it when he was 17, and we were trying to protect it. Luckily the Marin courts were very good about it and didn't give it to them". He later said, "I'd gotten out of the teenage phase and realized my parents weren't doing anything wrong but were trying to protect me."

1980 actors strike The primary point of contention regarded residuals from home media, such as videocassettes and pay television. By mid-July, the union and industry representatives were at an impasse, and the strike started on July 21. Additionally, the unions wanted a 35 percent salary increase across the board for their members. Specifically, the union was seeking a form of profit sharing wherein they would receive a percentage of the revenue made from home media releases. The strike was caused by a breakdown in labor contract negotiations between the two unions (who were negotiating for a joint contract) and representatives of film studios, television networks, and other independent producers. The 1980 actors strike was a labor strike held in July–October 1980 by the Screen Actors Guild (SAG) and the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (AFTRA), two labor unions representing actors in the American film industry. Several days later, the American Federation of Musicians (AFM, a labor union representing musicians in the film industry) also went on strike for similar reasons 5dec095fa0
