I suppose you could suggest a pagename change to The Answer to The Ultimate Question of Life, the Universe, and Everything, which might be more correct. I'm not sure if a decision was made long ago to shorten the actual title, considering the bolding at the top of the page is identical to what you just quoted. Perhaps they decided to go with the shorter name and figured it didn't matter as long as...

Propane Propane's per-BTU production of CO₂ is almost as low as that of natural gas. Discovered in 1857 by the French chemist Marcellin Berthelot, it became commercially available in the US by 1911. A by-product of natural gas processing and petroleum refining, it is often a constituent of liquefied petroleum gas (LPG), which is commonly used as a fuel in domestic and industrial applications and in low-emissions public transportation; other constituents of LPG may include propylene, butane, butylene, butadiene, and isobutylene. Propane has lower volumetric energy density than gasoline or coal, but has higher gravimetric energy density than them and burns more cleanly. It is a gas at standard temperature and pressure, but becomes liquid when compressed for transportation and storage. Propane burns Propane () is a three-carbon chain alkane with the molecular formula C₃H₈. combustion is much cleaner than that of coal or unleaded gasoline

The process of metrication is typically initiated and overseen by a country's government, generally motivated by the necessity of establishing a uniform measurement system for effective international cooperation in fields like trade and science. Governments achieve metrication through either mandatory changes to existing units within a specified timeframe or through voluntary adoption.

It retains its ability to vaporise even in cold weather, making it better-suited for outdoor use in cold climates than alternatives with higher boiling points like butane.
