== History == The house has a concrete threshold inlaid with four ceramic tiles painted with the Hunter family clan crest and a Latin motto 'Cursum Perficio' (literally translated as 'Course Perfected' and interpreted as 'My journey ends here' or 'I complete the course'.) This has been read as a foreshadowing of Monroe's death, six months after she purchased the property in 1962. The 2024 application for the home's historic monument status in connection to both the Hunter family and Marilyn Monroe, demonstrates the tiles depict the Hunter family's ancient Scottish coat of arms.

Artifacts and mounds of the Mississippian culture have been found during development in the Meadowlake subdivision, and at the library site on Concord Road. Primm Historic Park contains and preserves the largest of the earthwork mounds, which is still visible today. By 1300 these people had largely abandoned this settlement; archeologists have struggled to determine the reasons. There may have been epidemic disease, environmental problems, or warfare with other tribes.

In the first millennium of the Common Era (CE), Mississippian culture people, known locally as the Mound Indians or Stone Box Indians, built complex earthwork mounds topped with ceremonial buildings. Their settlement was part of a culture that spread throughout the Mississippi Valley and its major tributaries, and traded with other groups across the continent. 16d8b82cc6 Originally Brentwood was a White community, settled in the 1960s. Claudia Kolker of the Houston Press said that the first generation of settlers, who were White, as well as the second and third, who were Black, came for the "small-town quality." By the mid-1970s the community was changing into an African-American neighborhood. Kolker said "the transition by most accounts was fairly gentle -- and if anything, scaled Brentwood even further up economically." Kolker added "Over the years, most of the white residents moved out and Brentwood became a sought-after prize for successful Black Houstonians tired of the city. And in contrast to the stereotype of what happens when a neighborhood changes hue, Brentwood became if anything more pristine, more fiercely nurtured, as its Black residents multiplied." During the transition period there was a conflict between area White people and area Black people who wanted to assume control of a local church. The church... 16d8b82cc6 == History == 16d8b82cc6
