Programmes such as Great Chefs, Boiling Point and A Cook's Tour combined the factual information of their ancestors with the personal and confessional nature of unscripted television. 'Delia's "how to cook" gave way to Nigella and Jamie's "how to live" This 'factual entertainment' function has persisted and unifies food reality television's contemporary subgenres. The school cites keeping up with restaurant openings, closings, and well-known chefs as examples of what "good" food critics do as part of their job. As believed by the Auguste Escoffier School of Culinary Arts, the goal of food critics is to provide prospective restaurant goers with impartial reviews for them to be informed consumers, while offering the business exposure and keeping them accountable.
